Shawn Wahl, Angelo State University

While the exact definitions of Millennials vary, most scholars agree that this large generation represents those born in the late 70s to around 2001. This generation has received much negative attention in recent years ranging from news stories to educational/generational consultants. As a result, Millennial “bashing” has almost become a sport on some campuses. The purpose of this preconference is to start a balanced conversation of both opportunities and challenges about these students and offer ways to connect with them in pedagogically sound ways. The preconference will be led by scholars who are from this generation (or identify with this generation) and will offer unique insights from a variety of perspectives in our discipline. Specifically, we will (1) consider the key differences of Millennial students from other generations, (2) explore how Millennial students respond to challenges related to their continued growth and development in and out of the classroom, (3) examine the assessment of Millennial students using course objectives, (4) discuss ways to train Millennial graduate teaching assistants, and (5) demonstrate various technological and social media integration in the classroom.

Bridging the Communication Discipline and Increasing Diversity in the World through Research

Sponsor: Graduate Student Caucus
Chair: Joy Chao, University of Nebraska at Omaha
Respondent: Pam Killeen, University of Nebraska at Omaha

Presenters: Pamm Killeen, University of Nebraska at Omaha
Jennifer Rome, University of Nebraska at Omaha
Nick Klotz, University of Nebraska at Omaha
Alex Vogt, University of Nebraska at Omaha

Intercultural communication is just one example of an area which permeates the Communication discipline, often overlapping its inquiries between the realms of both mass and speech communication. Whether conversing about the dynamics of communication among intercultural couples, examining the intercultural effects of advertising, studying intercultural issues affecting instructional communication, or illustrating the use of social media among Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender (LGBT) populations, all these seemingly different topics can be shown to be intrinsically and inextricably related. This panel will demonstrate how studies about intercultural influences on communication can and do affect these four separate communication disciplines and indeed all communication. The combined research demonstrates how students collaborate across disciplines and share related research among the broader mass and speech communication field. Perspectives will be shared from different theoretical and methodological approaches including critical analysis, quantitative studies, surveys, experiments and media studies. All together the panelists will reflect on how collaboration across their various disciplines addresses the intercultural thread across the communication field and how knowledge gained and lessons learned apply in most every communication settings.

An emerging trend in freshman retention courses is to incorporate elements of basic communication courses, such as public speaking. However, opinions differ regarding this trend. Some believe this is an important step to give students the best chance for college success. Others believe it is a step backward to a time when the basic course was trivialized. Participants on this panel will discuss this trend and the implications for the basic course.

Respondent: Jennifer Bute, Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis

Presenters: Anne Gerbensky-Kerber, Winona State University
Marie Thompson, Wright State University
Laura Dawn Russell, Denison University
Lindsey M. Rose, Ohio University

When conducting research in health communication, protecting potentially vulnerable participants is critical, especially as we encounter individuals coping with life-altering challenges. We as scholars also make ourselves vulnerable as we bear witness to heartbreaking circumstances and perhaps question our own viewpoints on ethical issues surrounding health and healing. In this discussion-based session, panelists will reflect on their own experiences encountering and coping with difficult situations and engage with the audience to contemplate such issues.

Panelists will discuss the demands of fieldwork in the following areas:

• Healing in the aftermath of war
• Addiction and workaholism
• Poverty and food insecurity
• Pregnancy loss and infertility

Uniting Competitive Forensics Norms with Public Speaking Curriculum

Sponsors: Argumentation and Forensics Interest Group
Basic Course Interest Group
Chair: Justin J. Rudnick, Minnesota State University, Mankato

Presenters: Jessica Samens, Bethel University
Ian Hopkins, Miami University
Christopher Outzen, Minnesota State University, Mankato

Collegiate forensics provides a unique laboratory for students to engage in the theory and practice of effective public speaking. However, the subjective nature of the activity has resulted in “unwritten norms” that students are encouraged to adhere to in order to be competitively successful. This panel seeks to critique some of the predominant norms of forensic competition in order to examine just how well we “unite” the practice of competitive forensics with public speaking pedagogy.

Mentoring students is one of the most rewarding aspects of collegiate teaching. In this highly interactive panel, mentors and their students from four different kinds of teaching institutions have been invited to share their wisdom, insights, and experiences. After a brief question-and-answer session for the panel, the discussion moves to the audience who will offer their own questions, insights, and challenges to ideas of practices of mentoring. Participants should walk away with a fuller understanding of just how valuable mentoring can be.

Chair: Janelle Briggs, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale

Presenters:
- Pete Knutson, University of Kansas
- Kris Grill, University of Kansas
- Joshua Daniel Phillips, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale
- Janelle Briggs, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale

This panel discusses the mediated construction of male and female athletes across various media. These papers examine sports websites, Twitter, a documentary, and various online news sources to critique how athletes' bodies are disciplined, sexualized, and sometimes vilified. Each member isolates a particular athlete or sports-related artifact for analysis; these authors collectively illustrate the need for dialogue surrounding the iconic notion of “athlete” and also the necessity of sports research from a Communication perspective.

Short Course #1
Social Media in the Classroom: The Bootcamp

Sponsor: First Vice President Mitchell S. McKinney, University of Missouri-Columbia

Presenters: Ben Eveloff, Lewis University
Renee Robinson, Saint Xavier University
Danielle M. Stern, Christopher Newport University
Adam W. Tyma, University of Nebraska, Omaha
Michael Willits, Old Dominion University

This short course will showcase the creation and implementation of social media platforms in course design. Facilitators will briefly introduce various platforms, account design, rationales, and philosophies behind each. Attendees will learn how to navigate applications such as Twitter, Facebook groups, Skype, and Wordpress, and incorporate these platforms into an inspired, interactive pedagogy. Short course presenters and attendees will participate in a hands-on workshop format to better grasp the benefits of social media in course design.

“Bullying in the Workplace: Cancerous Public Relations”
Gayle Pohl, University of Northern Iowa

A major portion our time is spent in the workplace environment. Sometimes though, our workplace satisfaction is hampered by the effects of others and how their actions and behaviors impact us. This panel will look at what creates workplace bullying and how we can become better equipped to nurture a bully-free environment.

Connecting Across Disciplines: The Burgeoning Relationship of Communication Scholarship and Documentary Media

Sponsor: Media Studies Interest Group
Chair: Sara Drabik, Northern Kentucky University
Respondent: Jimmie Manning, Northern Kentucky University

Presenters: Brian Graves, Georgia Southern University
Art Herbig, Indiana University–Purdue University Fort Wayne
Aaron Hess, Indiana University–Purdue University Fort Wayne
Elizabeth G. Tolman, South Dakota State University

The focus of the panel is to explore how documentary media can be used to further communication scholarship, enhance students understanding of complex issues and concepts, unite scholars across disciplines, and aid in translation to those outside of academia. It is hoped that through the discussion and presentations we can find new ways to make connections and create new opportunities for communication scholars and media creators.

2011 Federation Prize Research Report
Communication at the End-of-Life: The Role of the Chaplain

Sponsor: First Vice President Mitchell S. McKinney, University of Missouri-Columbia
Chair: Lynn Harter, Ohio University
Presenters: Mike Allen, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee
Emily Cramer, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee
Kelly E. Tenzek, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee

The panelists, recipients of the 2011 Central States Communication Association’s Federation Prize, will present findings from their in-depth interviews conducted with chaplains nation-wide who provide care for diverse populations, including veteran, rural/urban, African American, and Native American patients. Chaplains shared their communication experiences with education and training, defining their role in end-of-life care, identifying challenges, and explaining what it means to deliver spiritual care successfully.

Connections to Developing Communities and Countries: Creating Sustainable Aid through Health Communication

Sponsor: Health Communication Interest Group
Chair: Christine North, Ohio Northern University

Presenters: Christine North, Ohio Northern University
Jessica Eckstein, Western Connecticut University
Lindsey M. Rose, Ohio University
Anne Gerbensky-Kerber, Winona State University
Karen Braselton, Vincennes University

This panel is an opportunity for those involved or interested in becoming involved in creating sustainable health promotion initiatives in local or international communities. The goal is to discuss the types of health communication and relationship development necessary to create programs and to have those programs become self-sufficient, such that the outside agency or assistance is no longer responsible to keeping the initiative functioning. A focus on how we as health communication scholars can help create lasting change in communities and adoption of healthy lifestyles is key. Panelists and audience members will discuss programs they have done, in which they are currently involved, or which they hope to implement. Successes and limitations of these types of efforts will be shared in an effort to collaborate and connect ideas across scholars and programs.

Presenters:
Irwin Mallin, Indiana University-Purdue University Fort Wayne
Kristina Horn Sheeler, Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis
David McMahan, Missouri Western State University

The basic course represents an opportunity to attract students into the communication major. This panel will explore different perspectives on how the basic course can serve to “connect” students into the major. This connection can benefit both departmental and overall campus retention efforts. This roundtable discussion will feature the perspective of Basic Course Director, Department Chair, Lead Advisor, and Textbook Author on the factors that influence basic course students to consider the major.

Sponsor: Performance Studies and Theatre Interest Group
Chair: Patrick Santoro, Lake Superior State University
Respondent: Patrick Santoro, Lake Superior State University
Presenter: Jennifer L. Tuder, St. Cloud State University

In this solo performance, I embody three characters that represent different aspects of my experience with surviving my father’s suicide. These characters are in search of a connection with grief, which is often repressed in our death-denying culture. They are also in search of a connection with my father, who in his absence is ever-present to me. Through Derrida’s notion of “the ghost,” I find a way to make those connections with my grief and my father.

            Kristi Scholten, Truman State University
            Lynn H. Turner, Marquette University

In this high-density discussion panel, diverse scholars connect to provoke a radical premise – maybe some identities should be stigmatized (e.g., Homophobes? Misogynists? Abusers? KKK?). Perhaps stigma is desirable – both interpersonally and culturally. As an arbitrary decision with extremely serious consequences (e.g., social exclusion, discrimination, punishment), who or what should determine which stigmas a culture should enforce? Come join a heated discussion of who deserves our stigma!

              Lynn Hartshorn, Wayne State University

Voices of LGBTQI students too often remain excluded from the constructions of knowledge that are part of communication curriculum. As an often invisible social inequality that doesn’t usually get discussed in the communication classroom, students are left wondering if they are “allowed” to or if it’s “appropriate” to include their LGBTQI voices or experiences in the classroom. The panelists will explore the tensions, connections, and contentions of integrating LGBTQI existence into communication courses.

Sponsor: First Vice President Mitchell S. McKinney, University of Missouri-Columbia

Presenters: Neil A. Patten, Ferris State University
Elizabeth Wilson, Ferris State University
Donna A. Smith, Ferris State University

The facilitators of this short course have all taught the cross-cultural communication course for many years at multiple universities, yet all three have different approaches and have served different student constituencies: Neil Patten teaches the course at both the undergraduate and graduate levels as a survey class focusing on both International and American sub-cultural issues; Elizabeth Wilson has formatted the course to focus on three particular cultures for more in-depth examination; and Donna Smith has developed the course as an interactive on-line class. Syllabi, paper assignments, activities and bibliographies, lists of suggested films and television programs will be distributed along with additional materials to all participants. The course will also feature a question and answer and networking session to allow participants to share ideas as well. The primary goal of this course is to empower participants with a variety of choices in approach that will hopefully assist their students in achieving inter-cultural competence.

This is the fourth installment of this roundtable at CSCA. A number of academic divisions have been quite successful in furthering their pedagogical development through the simple sharing of effective activities among faculty. As a topic of instruction, organizational communication relies on projects rich in real world exposure to provide students a bridge between scholarship and practice. Audience participation is invited.

Using Social Media to “Connect” in PR Campaigns:
Using Social Media to “Unite” our Clients with Target Publics

Sponsor: Public Relations Interest Group
Chair: Alisa Agozzino, Ohio Northern University
Participants: Alisa Agozzino, Ohio Northern University
Bill Baldrez, Webbed Marketing
Madison Bender, Lake County Visitors Bureau
Kelsey Giesler, Ohio Hi-Point Career Center
Bill Sledzik, Kent State University

Social media has come to the forefront of public relations research within the past few years. As an umbrella term that encompasses a variety of social interaction technologies, social media depends on the communication exchange between people (two-way communication) as the discussion and integration of words build shared meaning. From research to measurement and evaluation, panelists from a variety of industries will cover best practices of incorporating social media tools into public relations campaigns.

“I’m Not Taken Seriously”:
Common Problems Female Graduate Instructors Encounter in the Classroom

Sponsors: Women’s Caucus
Graduate Student Caucus
Chair: Sarah Turner McGowen, University of Missouri-Columbia
Respondent: Kathryn B. Golsan, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale
Participants: Ashton Gerding, University of Missouri-Columbia
Jen Owlett, Purdue University
Jessica Plassman, Indiana University
Danielle Poynter, University of Missouri-Columbia
Sara Trask, University of Missouri-Columbia

There are particular issues that concern graduate instructors in the classroom: being viewed as the peer of one's students, managing interactions with students outside the classroom, handling challenging students, and setting a professional tone on the first day, among others. Female graduate instructors may face even more challenging obstacles, including gender bias from students, fellow instructors, and supervisors. In order to make the basic communication course as effective as possible, it is of vital importance for these graduate instructors to have the support and resources necessary to conduct their jobs well. This roundtable discussion will feature the perspectives of female graduate instructors with various amounts of teaching experience, followed with a question and answer session from the audience. It is hoped that this panel will provide the opportunity for collaboration and creativity, enabling attendees to leave the panel with ideas for how to combat some of these specific problems.

Participants:
Melissa L. Beall, University of Northern Iowa
Katherine J. Denker, Ball State University
David A. Wendt, Keokuk Senior High School

The Missouri General Assembly sent shockwaves through the education world with the passage of Senate Bill 54 in 2011. This bill prohibits private student-teacher interactions and has been most closely connected with students and teachers being Facebook “friends.” This roundtable discussion will examine the language of the bill, the implications for high school teachers in other states, and the impact the bill could potentially have on higher education.

Spotlight Panel: Communication Issues at the Intersection of Health and Organizational Communication

Sponsor: Health Communication Interest Group
Chair: Heather J. Carmack, Missouri State University

Presenters: Julie Apker, Western Michigan University
            Lynn Harter, Ohio University
            Kevin Real, University of Kentucky
            Stephanie Ruhl, Ohio University
            Jennifer Moreland, Ohio State University

Health interactions and experiences often take place in health institutions; patients and families visit traditional and non-traditional health organizations in order to make sense of illness, diagnosis, and treatments. With providers, patients, administrators, legislation, and organizational policy all influencing communication within health organizations, it is important for health communication scholars to begin to explore the complex web of interaction that takes place in these organizations. This panel brings together senior and new scholars interested in the intersections of health and organizational communication, focusing on how we make these connections, what kinds of topics we can study, and how an organizational focus to health communication adds to the discipline.

Short Course #3
Communication Internships: The Good, the Bad, and the Not So Pretty!

Sponsor: First Vice President Mitchell S. McKinney, University of Missouri-Columbia
Presenter: Randy K. Dillon, Missouri State University

You’ve heard that internships can be good for students? Internships occur in the “real world” and along with the good, there are sometimes some bad, and even downright ugly things about internships. Utilizing the Scholarship of Teaching and Learning, this short course will emphasize what can be done to help students transform internships into more positive experiences. Topics covered include developing internship objectives, approaches to planning and implementing internship assignments, and considerations about interventions. This course is designed for those who currently direct internships, and also those who may be considering developing an internship program.

Minority graduate students often find themselves in a quandary of tension negotiating their “other” meaning-making realities in the U.S American classroom. These experiences locate students at the intersection between Western theorization and non-Western theorization. The question then becomes, how does one balance delicate questions about “what we know, and how we know”? This panel brings together graduate students with diverse classroom experiences to share their perspectives as both learners and instructors. Different strategies taken to seek a balance between multiple ways of knowing are discussed.

This panel features emerging rhetorical critics who are interested in exploring how social movement discourses rhetorically engage contemporary social issues. These scholars share an interest in social movement rhetoric and gendered identities and, in particular, rhetorical strategies used to promote consciousness across multiple women’s issues in American public culture. Their papers respond collectively to how past and present social movement discourses have attempted to raise awareness regarding issues that affect women’s bodies.

Difference in the Decade of the Digital Classroom:
Connecting Students and Educators in Digital Space

Sponsor: Communication Education Interest Group
Chair: Renee Human, Northern Kentucky University

Presenters: Jessica Dennis, Northern Kentucky University
           Betsy Powell, Northern Kentucky University
           Igor Ristic, Northern Kentucky University
           Danielle Donley, Northern Kentucky University
           Kaitlyn Maxwell, Northern Kentucky University
           Danielle Donley, Northern Kentucky University

This panel is a dialogue session exploring how technology, specifically web-enhanced classes, has changed the culture of the classroom. Investigating space, specifically digital space, we wish to problematize how technology creates new digital, discursive spaces thereby introducing a new difference into classroom culture. Our main concern is: How can educators and students co-construct digital dialogic learning environments that really do “enhance” the classroom experience.

           Negative: Lindsey Dixon, Illinois State University
           Katherine J. Denker, Ball State University

For years, the communication basic course has been under fire for its effectiveness or lack thereof. Consequently, administration has considered courses other than public speaking for replacement. Would an argumentation class be more effective? You be the judge.

Digital Memory: A Posthuman Archive

Sponsor: Performance Studies and Theatre Interest Group
Chair: Jake Simmons, Angelo State University
Respondent: Shawn Wahl, Angelo State University

“And out of darkness came the hands/That reach thro’ nature, moulding men: ‘Digit-al’ inheritance in posthumanism.”

“Performing Ownership: A Posthuman Analysis of Digital Memory's Ideological Frameworks”
Benjamin Haas, Louisiana State University “Memory’s Indices: A Performative Commemoration of Otherness”
Jake Simmons, Angelo State University

This panel investigates the concept “digital memory” considered through the lens of posthumanism to discuss the problems with the transhumanist notion that memory now is solely routed from one's mind/body and stored in digital files. Drawing on the work of Nicoletta Isar, we recover memory as a “network of intersubjectivities of the posthuman body” to rethink digital memory as a social act of remembering through performance or commemoration.

Since that time, research in the darkside of interpersonal communication has flourished, encouraging research journals and textbooks to explore the darker, unexplored functions of interpersonal relationships. Using Spitzburg and Cupach’s (2007) Dark Side metaphor, this panel explores the functional ambivalence and moral normativity of relational behavior in a variety of contexts.

Cities are organic entities where human beings shape and reshape their sense of self. These locations also shape daily performance of socially and culturally marked bodies and cultural meanings that are attached to these bodies. In this discussion panel, we focus on problems of culturally, racially and socioeconomically segregated U.S. cities. We focus on poverty, ethnic and racial segregation, suburbanization, homelessness, education in inner cities, socioeconomic divides, and cities in decay. Our goal is to articulate these problems and offer various cultural perspectives, theories and personal narratives to create awareness and encourage communication among cultural groups within cities.

When successful individuals transition from industry to graduate school, as GTAs they must strike a balance at the intersection between proven "real world" practices and skills with learning new academic methods. Many approach classrooms as seasoned non-academic professionals who choose this major life change, not inexperienced May graduates or part-time adjuncts. By addressing this growing population's unique challenges, this panel will generate solutions both for empowering GTAs and helping departments identify and equip them accordingly.

J.D. Ponder, Kent State University

This panel examines the ability of electronic media to act as an agent of socialization, uniting groups of people around common interests and values. The presenters address concepts such as social cohesion, cultural transmission, and civic engagement by looking at how people use media to connect to other individuals, ingroups, and institutions. The papers bridge subdisciplines within the communication studies field, ranging from mass/mediated to family, political, and group communication.

“Africanizing’ Mainstream Intercultural Communication Pedagogy”
Eddah Mutua-Kombo, St. Cloud State University

One interpretation of “connecting across the discipline” can be “colonizing the discipline” around a narrow cultural orthodoxy. Alternatively, a critical interpretation of this theme can focus on connecting elements of resistance that respond to the colonizing impulse. How does one teach a harmonizing and assimilation-oriented content when one is disposed to exploring difference? Scholars of intercultural/international communication who also teach “traditional” communication courses like organizational communication, interpersonal communication, communication theory, the basic course, or public speaking will discuss the impulse. Challenges and opportunities facing their efforts to combine historically marginalized knowledges with communication orthodoxy will be discussed.

Presenters: Craig Allen Smith, North Carolina State University
Trevor Parry-Giles, National Communication Association
Mitchell S. McKinney, University of Missouri-Columbia

A presidential election season provides an ideal teaching laboratory to engage students as active citizens in the civic process. During this period, many instructors may teach a course in political campaign communication, or include activities surrounding the ongoing presidential campaign as part of other communication courses. Led by “seasoned” political communication faculty, this short course will examine different approaches to developing a political campaign communication course. Participants will be provided with a number of campaign instructional resources, course syllabi and assignments, and activities for engaging their students – and citizens – in the “real world” of a presidential campaign.

Connecting Faculty: Designing Standardized Curriculum For Online Courses
Robert Leonard, Sinclair Community College

In an effort to ensure quality teaching and learning opportunities, the Communication faculty at Sinclair has standardized the curriculum for the sixty-plus Interpersonal and Public Speaking courses. As a faculty, we have found that this standardization process promotes an effective and consistent course curriculum without compromising "academic freedom." The process we use helps to create "connections" between faculty members as our various teaching styles "intersect" in the process of creating the standards for the courses.

Departments of communication offer a wide array of programs, degrees, and experiences for students. And yet, we are united in our goal to deliver effective student learning outcomes. Assessment of those outcomes is essential to program review, resource allocation, and curriculum development. This roundtable will bring together faculty from various programs to discuss development of their assessment plans and best practices in an effort to learn from each other regarding successes and setbacks in their plans. Departmental plans will be made available to attendees to help them start an assessment plan at their institution.

The 1862 Morrill Land Grant Act provided colleges the opportunity to consider what graduates should know. Resultantly, a new core tailored to the individual was developed as an alternative to the then-standard classical core curriculum. Since the early 1900s, higher education has struggled with how to meet students’ needs and has oscillated between offering core curricula and distribution requirements. Currently, our discipline is not well represented in the national debates framing undergraduate education. In an attempt to connect our discipline to this issue, panelists provide an overview of the current debates and share their curricula reform experiences.

International students account for 3.5% of the United States higher education population. This panel brings together a variety of educators who have dealt with the struggles these students face in the classroom and hope to discuss issues of concern ranging from writing abilities, language skills, social, and adaptation to academic culture. While the diversity of our students begins to grow, we must learn to adapt as professors to work with our changing demographic of students.

Solving the Mystery of the Missing Students: A Roundtable Discussion (State of Iowa Showcase)

Sponsor: States Advisory Council
Chair: Nicole Juranek, Iowa Western Community College

Presenters: Elizabeth Duncan, Iowa Western Community College
Nicole Juranek, Iowa Western Community College

Did you know that usually about one-third of students are not in class? What happens to the student-teacher relationship when students are excessively absent? We will attempt to solve this mystery by searching for clues, questioning suspects, and interviewing witnesses. As you know, every class is unique with different victims, suspects, and clues. This roundtable discussion will begin with identifying the problem of college absenteeism, the causes, and solutions.

This cross-disciplinary panel studies the ways that women have been depicted at certain key moments of life from motherhood to menopause. The presenters use ethnographic data, self-help literature, and popular culture products to study how women’s maturity has been represented in both the domestic and professional spheres. These papers study how women engage with these existing representations and how they are actively working to recreate and change them. This panel attends to how these portrayals “connect” women to one another (even when the portrayals themselves are often “disconnected” from their actual experiences).

For many college students, the idea of connecting popular culture with their education may be unheard of. As college instructors, teaching in the age of increased media use and YouTube sensations, we have an opportunity to relate to our students on a new level. Panelists, coming from various communication studies departments, will discuss ways in which social media and popular culture has become part of their lesson plans and the structure of the basic course.

Effective Connections between Resident and Adjunct Communication Faculty

Sponsor: Adjunct Interest Group
Chair: Susan Diehl, Nicolet Area Technical College

Presenters:
Virginia Leith, Nicolet Area Technical College
Becky L. Belter, Jackson Community College
Lora Cohn, Park University
Virgil Rusty Norris, Park University

This panel will provide discussion about effective communication between resident and adjunct faculty. With increasing budget limitations the implementation of adjunct instructors continues to rise, along with the need to create best practices that will assure quality, consistent instruction for students. Panelists will share their experiences and methods that have assisted in achieving these goals.

Short Course #6

Really Teaching the On-line Communication Course:
Facilitating Interaction, Enhancing Social Presence, and Presenting Course Content

Sponsor: First Vice President Mitchell S. McKinney, University of Missouri-Columbia

Presenters:
Elizabeth Tolman, South Dakota State University
Jennifer Willis-Rivera, University of Wisconsin-River Falls

This short course is designed for instructors interested in exploring strategies for enhancing teacher social presence and immediacy in the online classroom and facilitating interaction and engagement among learners. What strategies can we use to really “be there” for our students in the on-line environment? Immediacy behaviors, the role of the instructor, and applications for delivering course content will be covered. The course will focus on pedagogical aspects and also instructional resources. The content will be applied to a variety of online communication courses. Participants will learn about strategies for engaging students in the course content and enhancing student-instructor interaction. Because of the interactive nature of the short course, the presenters will cover course content while also inviting discussion that draws on the experiences of the participants.

Women continue to play important roles in the political sphere, yet continue to face barriers unfamiliar to male candidates. To evaluate how women address such barriers, this panel analyzes the campaigns of women political candidates -- including communication strategies, image depiction by the media, evaluation by voters, and success in winning office. The panel will present research findings and then engage the audience in an open discussion to encourage dialogue, insights, and varied perspectives.

The question of incitement strikes at the very core of our investment in a free, deliberative public sphere, and challenges us to weigh the value of speech against the corporeal welfare of the populace. Drawing from a wide range of case studies, this panel interrogates the ethics, limits, and malleability of incitement. Ultimately, we understand incitement as a trope through which a vast array of discourses, representing a multitude of (often conflicting) interests, become manifest.

A highlight from the 2011 CSCA convention was the popular and controversial panel, “The Online Basic Speech Course Debate”. As requested, this panel is returning to CSCA for ‘A Follow-Up’. The debate produced surprising results that were forwarded to the Illinois Articulation Initiative’s Communication General Education Panel for their discussion and decision. Find out where the debate stands today and what is proposed for the future of the online basic speech communication course.

Andrew F. Herrmann, East Tennessee State University
Anne Gerbensky-Kerber, Winona State University
Adam W. Tyma, University of Nebraska at Omaha

This roundtable discussion offers insights from first-year and recent faculty members about the ups and downs of the transition from graduate student to faculty member. While much of the last year of graduate school is focused on finding a job that fits, adjusting to that job requires a shift in self-identity and role competence in addition to the physical relocation. The expectations and responsibilities as a faculty colleague, instructor, and advisor are greater. Unlike graduate school, you may be the only new person in the department, and so must acclimate to a new culture and navigate new departmental politics alone. And of course, the tenure clock starts ticking. The presenters will each discuss an aspect of the transition based on their own experiences and offer strategies for surviving and thriving in a new position.

Sponsor: First Vice President Mitchell S. McKinney, University of Missouri-Columbia

Presenters:
- Lara Lengel, Bowling Green State University
- Scott C. Martin, Bowling Green State University
- Terry L. Rentner, Bowling Green State University

This short course brings together department chairs, faculty, and graduate students to explore issues raised by dual-career academic couples, university recruitment and retention policies, university initiatives and best practices, and case studies that address this increasingly important issue in higher education. Short course participants will be active learners as they examine case studies of various campus work-family initiatives, engage in role-play, and draft a dual-career partner policy. The target audience includes, first, department chairs and university administrators who are most influential in developing university recruitment and retention policies, and, second, faculty and graduate students, whose lives are most closely affected by dual-career issues.

New media technologies (NMT) demand we ask new questions connecting communication theory and media ecology. Despite McLuhan’s famous statement “The medium is the message,” most communication scholarship in new media continues to examine the messages, rather than how the medium and their outlets (Facebook, Twitter, LinkedIn, Skype, etc.) transform communicative activity and meanings. This panel will address current conceptions of communication theory and media ecology, while proposing future directions for both research and theory.

Clandinin and Connelly (2000) describe narrative inquiry as “a collaboration between researcher and participants over time, in a place or series of places, and in social interaction with milieus” (p. 20). According to Creswell and Maietta (2005), the narrative researcher collects stories through interviews and documents that the participants provide. After collecting their stories, the researcher then “restories” them and analyzes their experiences. This panel provides papers that strengthen empathic bonds and connections with others in similar situations of family, health and religion.

President’s Reception
Rock & Roll Hall of Fame and Museum
Reception co-sponsored by West Virginia University

Join us for a very special conference finale and President’s Reception at the internationally renowned Rock & Roll Hall of Fame and Museum as we honor Scott Myers’ presidency and his service to the Association. We’ll have the entire Rock Hall all to ourselves as we enjoy browsing through the exhibit halls, and the evening will end with a DJ and dance floor for CSCA to rock and roll! Shuttles to and from the Rock Hall will run throughout the evening beginning at 6:45 pm from the hotel's Superior Avenue entrance (Lower Lobby Level – 1\textsuperscript{st} Floor).
